GMDN AGENCY PUBLISHES LANDMARK STUDY ON NOMENCLATURE MAPPING WITH EMDN

- Research highlights complexities and challenges in harmonising medical device nomenclatures
- Results show only one in four (26%) of GMDN Terms closely correspond to an EMDN terminal term
- Three out of four (74%) of GMDN Terms correspond to other/various EMDN terminal terms

The Global Medical Device Nomenclature (GMDN) Agency has released a groundbreaking research paper, marking a significant milestone in the field of medical device nomenclatures.

Led by Dr Vasileios Zampetoulas, this study delves into the feasibility of mapping GMDN to the European Medical Device Nomenclature (EMDN), uncovering intricate challenges that could impact prospects for global harmonisation. Read our press release at this link. The full research paper can be read here.
A SINGLE GLOBALLY UTILISED NOMENCLATURE IS A PATIENT SAFETY ISSUE

John Wilkinson, Chair of the Board of Trustees at the GMDN Agency talks about why the aim for a single medical device nomenclature is important and how fundamentally it is a patient safety issue. You can watch his video below and read his supporting blog on this vital topic here.

MAXIMISING STAKEHOLDER ENGAGEMENT: A MULTIFACETED APPROACH BY THE GMDN AGENCY

To mark his first six months at the GMDN Agency, our Senior Communications Manager, Paul Wadsworth, has written a blog highlighting how the Agency is maximising its stakeholder engagement via multiple channels.

You can read about our approach to engagement with our stakeholders here:

“Having just reached my first six months in role as the Senior Communications Manager at the Global Medical Device Nomenclature (GMDN) Agency, I am excited to share how we have been strategically maximising engagement with our stakeholders through a diverse array of channels.

From our brand-new public-facing website to thought leadership blogs, workshops, and participation in international conferences, our multi-channel approach is ensuring that our stakeholders remain informed, empowered, and connected like never before.”
